Erosional Structures

You will learn the four classes of sedimentary structures: erosional, depositional, deformational, and biogenic. Erosional structures are formed during the relatively high shear stress before deposition of the bed. Depositional structures form during the waning of flow and the decreasing shear stress of a depositional event. Deformational structures form by the deformation of a previously deposited layer of sediment and may occur as the sediment is being deposited or afterwards. Biogenic structures include a variety of tracks, trails, burrows, and biogenic casts by organisms.

Erosional Structures

During the waning stages of a depositional event, high shear stresses typically occur in the sediment surface. Often, but not always, the erosion occurs down into fine-scale features which can be sculpted and eroded by the flow yet retain its shape. As shear stress decreases, the erosion ceases and the surface is filled with sand. As a result, the bottom of a sandy bed may contain erosional features, flow casts project from the bottom of the sandy bed and may be associated with other erosional structures; the first four are produced by fluted scours, the last four are produced by bedload.

1) Flute casts are elongate ridges with a bulbous nose at one end and a flared shallow end at the other. Flutes range from 5 to 50 cm long, 1 to 20 cm wide, and up to 10 cm deep. Flutes are formed by turbulent fluted scours generated by flow detachment at an initially low point on the bed, such as an abrupt neck or burrow. The nose of the flute points upstream, and the flared shallow end points downstream.

2) Longitudinal scours are a series of closely spaced ridges and furrows that may locally coalesce. The ridges are spaced 0.3 – 1 cm apart, and are a fraction of a centimeter deep. The ridges are sharp and the erosional furrows between them are broad and rounded. Longitudinal scours are generally preserved as casts on the bottom of sandstone beds. Like flute casts, longitudinal scours are produced by fluted scours. Longitudinal scours are aligned with the direction of flow although it is generally not possible to tell which of the two ends is upstream. Image from Bently and Demco, 2002.
